

HEALING THROUGH REMEMBERING

SUBMISSION TO THE PANEL OF PARTIES IN THE NI EXECUTIVE: ON PARADES AND PROTESTS; FLAGS, SYMBOLS AND EMBLEMS, AND RELATED MATTERS; AND THE PAST

Following a recent meeting with Dr O'Sullivan and Mr Lowden, Healing Through Remembering (HTR) offers the attached Core Values and Principles for Dealing with the Past document.

The experience of HTR suggests there is no single solution for the process of dealing with the past. Whilst some processes of remembering, reflecting and educating must be sustained for another generation at least, other aspects need to be time-bound. Dealing with the past has been and will continue to be a painful and difficult task, but this should not paralyse us and prevent us from moving on. Rather, it should encourage us to avoid further damage, seek solutions and create a better future.

Devising dynamic practices and methods for dealing with the past will require a spirit of tolerance and respect as well as a willingness to take risks. HTR believes the attached principles are necessary to build effective approaches and processes for dealing with the past. It also believes it is important that our society grasp the opportunity to remember in a constructive way so as to enable us to move into a new future built on a shared acknowledgement of the conflict in and about Northern Ireland. HTR is presently finalising a report outlining the current context of initiatives dealing with the past (which will be available in mid-November).

While HTR is committed to on-going and long term work in this area, it has always recognised that the process is much larger than it alone can address. The work will stand or fall on the commitment of those willing to take it forward. The Northern Ireland Assembly, the British and Irish Governments, and local political leadership must both endorse the need to deal with the past and create an environment conducive for this to happen. Civil society – communities, community groups, churches, individuals and organisations – needs to do the same.

Establishing the truth about the past, to the degree that this is possible, is an important right for all. Ways of pursuing this in a structured and consensual way should be sought. However, the organisation also believes it essential that dealing with the past not be seen merely in terms of truth recovery. Rather, it is important that the issues of commemoration and remembering, storytelling, a day of reflection, a living memorial museum and acknowledgement are all considered and addressed. These together should provide the foundation for dealing with the past.

As an organisation, HTR is committed to assisting with the work required to take this process forward. Accordingly, it offers its experience and resources to the fullest extent possible.

Healing Through Remembering
31 October 2013

Healing Through Remembering

Healing Through Remembering (HTR) is an independent initiative made up of a diverse membership with different political perspectives working on a common goal of how to deal with the legacy of the past.

The membership includes people from loyalist, republican, British Army and police backgrounds as well as individuals from different religious backgrounds, victims' groups, academics and community activists. They have come together over the last twelve years to focus on the issue of how to deal with our conflictual past.

HTR seeks to ensure that its work is framed by sound principles for dealing with the past including respect, diversity of opinion, willingness to engage and inclusivity.

The HTR methodology for this work is:

Providing Safe space

- Creating environments in which individuals can feel safe and supported while they engage in difficult or challenging conversations.

Building and sustaining relationships

- Creating a variety of opportunities in which people with different perspectives and experiences develop new relationships and explore options for cooperation and collaboration. Utilising a range of approaches to create connections (one-to-one conversations, study visits, output-focused tasks). Providing opportunities and encouragement to sustain relationships in the longer-term.

Sharing the learning

- Creating opportunities for the gathering and dissemination of learning on a wide variety of dealing with the past issues. Developing and utilising appropriate modes of dissemination (reports, events, exhibitions, newsletters, internet, social media) in order to maximise the learning and reach.

Background to the Organisation

Healing Through Remembering was established to support discussion exploring ways of examining the past and remembering so as to build a better future. The Project was formally launched on 8 October 2001.

Following a public consultation in 2002 HTR identified five areas that needed further consideration. HTR has been engaging in discussion on developing each of these since 2003:

- Day of reflection
- Truth recovery and acknowledgment
- Network of commemoration
- Living memorial museum
- Collective storytelling

The Membership of HTR has considered each of these areas over the last ten years and directed the work of the organisation to develop work and inform the wider debate. HTR has commissioned research, scoping studies, audits evaluations and reports. It has engaged locally and internationally with other groups and organisations. It has developed significant initiatives such as a Day of Reflection on 21st June and a temporary exhibition of Everyday Objects Transformed by the Conflict (currently on view in HTR offices).

Healing Through Remembering
Alexander House
17a Ormeau Avenue
Belfast
BT2 8HD

Tel 028 90238844
Fax: 028 90239944

Email: info@healingthroughremembering.org

Healing Through Remembering

Core Values and Principles for Dealing With the Past

HTR drew up the following framework of core values and principles to inform an approach to dealing with the past.

Core Values and Principles for Dealing with the Past

INTRODUCTION TO HEALING THROUGH REMEMBERING

Healing Through Remembering (HTR) is an independent initiative made up of a diverse membership with different political perspectives working on a common goal of how to deal with the legacy of the past.

The membership includes people from loyalist, republican and security force backgrounds as well as individuals from different religious backgrounds, victims/survivors groups, academics and community activists. Since 2001 these diverse members have focused on the issue of how to deal with the past relating to the conflict in and about Northern Ireland – and in so doing to build a better future.

CORE PRINCIPLES FOR AN APPROACH TO DEALING WITH THE PAST

In considering the important issue of how to deal with the past, Healing Through Remembering (HTR) has reflected on what can be learned from the organisation's own processes and projects.

Clearly views on remembering are contested, yet memory is fundamental to our human condition. It is therefore important that society needs to find ways to remember more sensitively, inclusively and honestly.

The key lesson from the work of HTR is that dealing with the past is a process which must be informed by core principles. HTR therefore devised the following principles in 2008, distilled from members' experience and learning. These have been reviewed and revised slightly over time. They have guided and informed HTR in maintaining an inclusive process, reaching consensus between groups while addressing very difficult issues. They continue to do so. HTR's experience shows that only through a sound framework grounded both in process and in principles, can practical solutions be sought.

The following core principles have been identified and are offered as the foundational structures on which society might deal with the legacy of the past. These are not merely a list of values to adhere to – but rather embody a framework for what needs to be put in place in order to deal with the past.

They are grouped for ease of use under three headings – society, process and individual.

SOCIETY

Commitment to a better future

This principle is based on the need to learn from the past so that conflict is not repeated. To build a future that is peaceful, politically stable, and benefits generations to come we must deal with the past. We need to acknowledge what happened and to learn from it (although different people might take different lessons). In order to address individual and collective needs, to build relationships that rehumanise people and heal the divisions, an honest analysis of the past is necessary. We need to understand what brought us to the point of conflict, what exacerbated and perpetuated the conflict and what facilitated the building of peace. Additional benefits would be the capacity to share our learning and experience with other contexts where conflict – or the potential for conflict – is present.

Not forgetting

This principle is based on the fact that we cannot ignore the past; it is not possible, neither is it desirable to forget. It is understandable that people want to avoid remembering painful events that may damage our current stability but our experience is that, with support and a structured way forward, it is not only possible to address difficult issues but also to use remembering in a positive and constructive manner. We live in a society where the threat of violent conflict is still present. We need to ensure that this process prevents recurrence and protects future generations. The challenge is not to attempt to forget, but rather to find appropriate ways to remember. International experience has shown that forgetting allows the conflict to re-emerge in later generations.

Healing and hurt

This principle builds on the essential requirement to do no harm. It includes the need to take care not to inflict unintentional harm while recognising that some will be hurt whatever approach is taken (e.g. by the revealing of uncomfortable truths). It is important that this principle is considered at all times – the value of actions must be considered in terms of the potential harm, while also realising that individual and societal healing can only take place once the pain of the past is acknowledged. An honest indication of the potential for individual harm must be made clear, and properly resourced and financed care and support must be established.

Centrality of truth

This principle acknowledges that society has a right to the truth about the past. While we recognise there is no agreed legal framework for a 'right to truth' as a society, we need to acknowledge that it is a fundamental right of everyone. Foundational principles to truth recovery are independence, honesty, transparency, provision of an effective remedy and a willingness to engage. That said, it is also of course problematic and there can be multiple truths. There are different versions of what the truth involves. Yet truth recovery, to a limited degree for some, is still possible and should be a principle we hold dear. Truth plays an important part in healing divisions in society. While truth is an important issue it is also challenging. This is because while some people advocate that truth is achievable through a truth commission, others propose truth recovery can be an ensemble of various processes, and still others feel that there is already too much emphasis on truth recovery. In the current context, truth recovery is happening (e.g. the Historical Enquiries Team, public enquiries, court cases, etc.). We do not want to pass judgement on particular methods as these may work for some individuals, but the piecemeal uncoordinated approach impedes a collective understanding. Truth recovery needs a structured and comprehensive approach. If done selectively it can be damaging, especially if the timing is not right and barriers can hamper progress.

Realistic and hopeful goals

This last principle relates to goals. There needs to be a clear articulation of the way things can be done versus what can be done. While there is urgency in dealing with the past because with time the voices and experiences of a generation can be lost, there must also be recognition that there is no 'quick fix'. While some elements may be time-bound, it is clear that other aspects of dealing with the past will need to continue for at least a generation. Our experience has shown us that the complexity of these issues means that the timeframe must be constantly under review. We now realise that this is generational work, but with the potential of real benefit for current and future generations. It is important that our political and community leaders help society to achieve a realistic view of the processes necessary and the timeframe involved. At the heart of this must be the identification and upholding of hopeful goals.

Summary of Core Values and Principles for Dealing with the Past

SOCIETY

Commitment to the future

To build a future that is peaceful, politically stable, and benefits generations to come, we must deal with the past.

Healing and hurt

The value of actions must be considered in terms of the potential harm, while also realising that individual and societal healing can only take place once the pain of the past is acknowledged.

Not forgetting

The challenge is not to attempt to forget, but rather to find an appropriate way to remember.

Realistic and hopeful goals

Dealing with the past is generational work, with the potential of real benefit for current and future generations. At the heart of this must be the identification and upholding of hopeful goals.

Right to truth

Society has a right to the truth about the past. Foundational principles to truth recovery are honesty, transparency and a willingness to engage. Truth recovery needs a structured and comprehensive approach.

PROCESS

Language and terminology

The use of language must enable engagement, not hamper or divert debate and dialogue. Terminology may change and develop over time due to a changing context and the working out of suitable processes.

Trust, transparency and engagement

Trust must be built at all levels and honesty in engagement is vital to maintain trust. Listening to each other's viewpoint while not necessarily agreeing with it is important – accepting that we have different opinions but can share them.

Flexibility

An approach must adapt to changing needs and context, growing awareness, newly unearthed questions, issues and circumstances. Participation should be allowed as appropriate and may change and evolve over time.

Independence and political commitment

Processes must be officially sanctioned at a political level while maintaining independence in terms of planning and operation. All political parties must commit themselves to dealing with the past in order to build a better future for all.

Structured and holistic approach

There must be coordination between all the mechanisms for dealing with the past. A range of integrated options is necessary to meet the needs of society and these must unfold over time.

Recognition & appreciation of existing work

There is already a wide range of remembering projects underway looking at dealing with the past in a way that will build a better society. It is important to enable these initiatives to continue in their work, and ensure they are seen as complementary to, and not in competition with, any other projects or approaches that may be proposed.

INDIVIDUAL

Inclusive, diverse, participative and empowering

A full range of voices and opinions must be heard if understanding is to be generated and mature relationships are to be built. The approach should empower people and create a shared sense of purpose while being realistic about the difficulties that inclusive processes involve.

Core Values and Principles for Dealing with the Past

PROCESS

Language and terminology

This principle outlines how the use of language must enable engagement, not hamper or divert debate and dialogue. Terminology may change and develop over time due to changing context and the working out of suitable processes. HTR has learned much in this regard. For example, there was, when the project was set up, an ongoing debate about how to refer to the conflict that took place. There were those that favoured terms like 'war' and others used 'Troubles'. The result was a long (nearly two-month) discussion in order to reach a compromise and a term – 'conflict in and about Northern Ireland' – which is now used in HTR communication. In a similar vein, the term victim is contested, and we have opted for the OFMDFM definition presented in the Victim Strategy Document (2002) that allows an individual to self-define as a victim. Thus we have learned that resolving these issues is not easy. No one can prescribe language. Like so much else, it needs to be negotiated, and can also evolve.

Structured and holistic approach

This principle involves the importance of following a structured and holistic approach for dealing with the past. The piecemeal approach currently operating in society does not serve our collective needs. There are many varied needs and issues – often conflicting – and so a structured comprehensive approach covering all the areas being addressed by HTR: i.e. truth recovery, living memorial museum, day of reflection, storytelling, and commemoration – and perhaps some others – is needed. Even within each area, such an approach is important. There must be coordination between all the mechanisms for dealing with the past. Structure must ensure that there can be delivery and hopefully a conclusion to processes, while being sufficiently flexible to meet changing needs and circumstances. A multifaceted approach, including the overlapping issues listed above, must be further developed. There is no single solution. A range of integrated options is necessary to meet the needs of society and these must unfold over time. Process – including discussions, debate, engagement, listening, learning, acknowledgement and flexibility – is important. In a divided society, the process where each aim or aspect is attended to, is as important as the final product.

Trust, transparency and engagement

This principle stresses that trust must be built at all levels and that honesty in engagement is vital to maintain trust. There is need for transparency in the formation and workings of all processes in order to build enough trust for processes to operate successfully and to ensure the best benefits for society. Listening to each other's viewpoint while not necessarily agreeing with it is important – accepting that we have different opinions but can share them.

Independence and political commitment

This principle emphasises that processes must be officially sanctioned at a political level while maintaining independence in terms of planning and operation. All political parties must commit themselves to dealing with the past in order to build a better future for all. Those who sanction this must maintain an open, full and honest commitment to its processes. Issues of political will, efficacy, capacity and generosity must be explored. Politicians have a duty to act in the interests of their citizens and to show leadership.

Recognition and appreciation of existing work

This principle relates to existing work. There is already a wide range of remembering projects underway that look at dealing with the past in a way that will build a better society. It is important to enable these initiatives to continue in their work, and ensure they are seen as complementary to, and not in competition with, any other projects or approaches that may be proposed.

Flexibility

This principle outlines that an approach that is flexible is vital in order that diverse needs can be met. Those who wish to engage with any process should be able to do so as soon as possible, e.g. those who want and need to tell their stories, learn, share or be informed, since time is passing and matters of aging and ill-health must also be taken into account. An approach must adapt to changing needs and context, growing awareness, newly unearthed questions, issues and circumstances. The legacy of the conflict and the development of the peace process mean that some people only realise the personal legacy of the past as issues are addressed. Participation should be allowed as appropriate and may change and evolve over time. The approach must stay alert to the wider international context (e.g. foreign policy issues, the resonances and implications of language such as the 'war on terror').

INDIVIDUAL

Inclusive, diverse and participative

This principle emphasises that it is vital that an inclusive approach for dealing with the past is adopted. This is an issue for all of society and across these islands. The approach must be participatory to enable everyone to have ownership so that the lessons learned can be understood and shared amongst the widest possible cross-section of society. All groups, organisations and individuals (including but not limited to, churches, media, education, business community, judiciary, academia and statutory services) must understand their part in the approach. This conflict affected and involved all sections of society, the two governments and international players. It is therefore important that this range of people also be involved in attempts to tackle this issue. A full range of voices and opinions must be heard if understanding is to be generated and mature relationships are to be built. All opinions held honestly and put forward should be regarded as valid even if others disagree and find them challenging. The approach should empower people and create a shared sense of purpose while being realistic about the difficulties that inclusive processes involve.

CONCLUSION

There is no single solution for the process of dealing with our past. Some processes of remembering, reflecting and educating must be sustained for another generation at least, while recognising that other aspects may need to be time-bound. All have a part to play in dealing with the memories of the past.

As you know from the range of initiatives and work to date in this area, this has been and will continue to be a painful and difficult task. However it should not paralyse us and prevent us from moving on, but rather encourage us to avoid further damage, seek viable solutions and create a promising and better future.

To translate the principles for dealing with the past and work done to date into dynamic and unique practices and methods for dealing with the past in a spirit of tolerance and respect will require a willingness to take risks.

We believe it important that our society grasps the opportunity of remembering in a constructive way, to enable us to move into a new future built on a shared acknowledgement of the violent conflict in and about Northern Ireland. We as an organisation are committed to assisting in taking this process forward.

All reports produced and published by Healing Through Remembering are available to order direct from the office or on our website at:

<http://www.healingthroughremembering.org/resources/reports>

European Union

European Regional Development Fund
Investing in your future

A project supported by the PEACE III Programme managed for the Special EU Programmes Body by the Community Relations Council/Pobal Consortium

Healing Through Remembering
Alexander House
17a Ormeau Avenue
Belfast BT2 8HD

Tel: 028 9023 8844
Fax: 028 9023 9944

e: info@healingthroughremembering.org
w: www.healingthroughremembering.org

Other Publications Available

Ethical Principles –
Storytelling and Narrative
Work

At the End of the Day – Commemoration:
Forward Thinking into the Past

Momentum and Change: An overview of the role and remit of Healing Through Remembering

Artefacts Audit: A report on the material culture relating to the conflict in and about
Northern Ireland

Without Walls: A report on the Open Call for Ideas for a Living Memorial Museum

Day of Private Reflection: 2007, 2008 and 2009, 2010 and 2011 evaluations

Making Peace with the Past: Options for truth recovery regarding the conflict in and about
Northern Ireland

Making Peace with the Past – Executive
Summary

The Viability of Prosecution Based on Historical Enquiry

Acknowledgement and its Role in Preventing Future Violence

A Day of Private Reflection: Discussion Paper
and Proposal

A Day of Reflection: Local Scoping Study

Storytelling as the Vehicle? Conference
Report

International Experiences of Days of Remembrance and Reflection

Storytelling Audit: An audit of personal story, narrative and testimony initiatives related to the conflict in and about Northern Ireland.

[facebook.com/healingthrough
remembering.org](https://facebook.com/healingthroughremembering.org)

@HTRinfo

[youtube.com/
htrinfo](https://youtube.com/htrinfo)

